Excerpt: .out which is of a deeper bronze or a more striking crimson. Beyond the bracken is the moor, covered with purple heather. It is relieved by a yellow tree here, and three russet-garbed oaks yonder, and then is interspread with patches of lovely bracken.-Peewits are flying low and settling beyond the furze bushes. A Snipe rises at my feet and darts away, and presently is out of sight. Above, a Lark sings his simple but sweet song. What a glorious landscape all of this must appear to be from his lofty point of view! no wonder, therefore, that he sings! The notes are not so loud as they were in the spring; and although he is at no great height, they are not very-distinct. A Magpie leaves the wood and drops across to the oaks, chucking as he flies. Cock Pheasants are calling defiantly, and from the heather the notes of a solitary Partridge that has escaped the guns can also be heard. In the wood there is suddenly a great commotion. Two squirrels are playing among the trees. They do not see me, and I am able to get closer, and then, while in hiding, I wait and watch their gymnastic exercises. They are in a pine tree; one is on each side of the stout trunk clinging to the wood about a yard from the ground. Each is in a state of expectant excitement, and often peeps round to see whether its...
