Excerpt: . . . 11 lect Agent being operated on at each laboratory, the personnel who are cleared for handling of BSAT and inventories, and approve transfers of BSAT between laboratories. What we have been doing as a body within the interagency for about a year now is to review these issues. ( And you just alluded to the report that has been pro-vided in draft to the administration in response to the Presidents Executive Order is going through its final coordination with the interagency. ) There needs to be, clearly, someone in overall charge of directing that oversight. All of the reports that are coming forward note the need for ac-tivity that can bring that all together. But what were looking for, quite frankly, is the development of, if you will, a set of minimal requirements in terms of personnel reliability, accounting, security, training, best laboratory practices that take into account the views of all the stakeholders, and then bringing that together and saying, okay, heres what we have done that does represent that balance between the critical elements of security for the select agents, which quite frankly are of varying degrees of virulence. So, you might come out with the idea of a stratified system that one might use. ARDIN Senator C. The Commission to prevent the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction has suggested a tier approach. Mr. R. Yes. EED Senator C. I think there are 80 agents today that are of ARDIN concern that are under the regulation. They are suggesting tier one would be about eight. EED Mr. R. Yes, sir. Senator...
