As The Wind Walks begins in the working class streets of 1940 Baltimore. On a blustery evening, young Edmund Carter leaves his home and hikes to the blue-collar docks of Fells Point. He walks toward his great-grandfather's home, hoping to cool down from a heated argument with his mother, and away from her unbending attitude about him joining the Marines. She sees the war in Europe edging closer to home. Ninety-two year old Civil War vet, David Werner, greets his grandson by calling him Pete; a name Gramps began calling him two years ago. Edmund knows this a prologue to a night filled with banter and stories. Pete That's someone else's name, Gramps. I'm Edmund. I know who you are, Pete. You're here to get away from my granddaughter. Come on, sit a spell, we'll talk. What's the topic War. David regales his grandson with stories from his past. Gramps amazes the eager boy with tales of the time he lied about his age, and joined the Union Army at the age of fourteen. He talks about his experiences in 1861, training with the 55th Ohio Volunteer Regiment. Edmund and David connect like never before. In the following days Edmund becomes more aware of the ugly reality of war, and then, something else changes. In an odd turn of events, he asks the neighborhood beauty, Athena, if she will accompany him to a dance. She accepts. Fate intervenes in his life. In this coming of age moment, two young people begin on the road toward an epic romance. Weeks go by and Edmund is no longer as concerned about the drumbeat of war in Europe. Now, Athena...
